Trafalgar Cemetery & Nelson

Victory Towed back to Gibraltar in 1805, Clarkson Stanfield, 1852

This cemetery was consecrated in 1798 and originally known as South Ditch Cemetery because of its location south of the defensive wall. Although its present name commemorates the Battle of Trafalgar, only two of those buried here died of their wounds suffered at Trafalgar (Lieut. William Foster, Royal Marines Corp of HMS Mars and Lieut. Thomas Norman of HMS Colossus, grave numbers 121 and 101).

Most of those that died at Trafalgar were buried at sea and Lord Nelson's body was transported back to London for a state funeral and burial at St. Paul's Cathedral in London.

Plan for Battle of Trafalgar, 1848, W. Blackwood & Sons

Other seamen from the battle of Trafalgar who died of their wounds at the old Naval Hospital were buried in the St Jago's Cemetery on the northern side of this defensive wall, however these tombstones were moved here in 1932 and set into the eastern wall. There are also a few freestanding stones, some of which date back to the 1780s, which have been transferred over the years from the Alameda Gardens. Many of the rest of the tombs here are of the victims of the three terrible yellow fever epidemics that ravaged Gibraltar in 1804, 1813 and 1814. There are also tombs from service casualties from the sea battles- the Battle of Algeiras (1801), and other actions off Cadiz (1810) and Malaga (1812), during the Napoleonic Wars.

Every year on the Sunday closest to the 21st October, the Royal Navy commemorates the Battle of Trafalgar at this cemetery.

Gibraltar and the Nelson Connection:

Although Lord Nelson is not buried in Gibraltar, there are a number of connections between the Admiral, Trafalgar and Gibraltar. Apart from the naval facilities such as the Naval Yard, the Victualling Yard, The Mount, the Old Naval Hospital and Rosia Bay (where the HMS Victory was towed into after the Battle of Trafalgar with Nelson's body onboard), all places Nelson would have visited during the times he came through Gibraltar, Nelson also had a close friend in Aaron Cardozo, a wealthy Gibraltar merchant, to whom he bequeathed his medal commemorating his victory at the Battle of the Nile. As well as Nelson himself, HMS Victory, Nelson's famous flagship, was also a regular visitor to Gibraltar. For example, since she was commissioned in 1765, the Victory had been Lord Howe's flagship in 1782 and taken part in the Relief of Gibraltar on 11th October bringing fresh supplies to the besieged Garrison.
